

There is no good, honest, fair reason for the FCC to change its rule regarding the amount of stations a single corporation can own. The only real justification for doing such involves money and leaves a rotten, graft-like after-taste. Allowing Clear Channel and Infinity to buy up all the radio stations has resulted in a bland uniform radio marketplace that is hardly worth listening to. The same will be true of television if the proposed alteration occurs. Greed and larceny have a strong pull and I have very little faith that Mr. Powell will, at least, make the debate on this issue more public and less rushed, because I do not think he has the public's best interest at heart. All the same I wish to make my views on this matter known: Do not give Fox, Viacom and Disney absolute control of the broadcast media.
